ABSTRACT

The present study was conducted to analyse the effect of seed and seedling priming with ZnSO₄ as well as ZnNO₃ on four rice varieties Annappoma, Gandhakashala, Kumkumashali and Ponmani. The results indicate that priming with both Zn compounds and different stages of priming have a significant impact on rice plants as evident from the increase in light and dark reactions of photosynthesis as evident from increased pigment content, photosystem activities, chlorophyll stability index, Chl a fluorescence parameters and IRGA parameters. The antioxidative function of the primed plants was enhanced as evident from the activities of superoxide dismutase, catalase, ascorbate peroxidase and guaiacol peroxidase; accordingly, the lipid peroxidation as indicated by the malondialdehyde content was less in those, when compared to non-primed control plants. Thus, by improving the photochemistry and antioxidant network, the growth and yield of the rice plants in terms of height, seed setting %, harvest index and 100 grain weight were enhanced in primed plants. The priming at seed and seedling stages and the additional foliar application of Zn compounds during reproductive stages such as booting, flowering and milky stages has enhanced the Zn content, reduced the phytate, and enhanced the bioavailability of Zn in rice grains as evident from the phytate to Zn molar ratio as well as the trivariate model. When compared to ZnSO₄, ZnNO₃ had a superior impact on all the studied parameters. In all the parameters analysed Kumkumashali responded superior to others, thus this landrace of rice can be successfully utilised for Zn biofortification.

Introduction

The United Nations (UN) adopted a sustainable development agenda and established 17 sustainable development goals (SDGs) for 2030. These goals promote prosperity and protect our planet. Goal two is zero hunger, with a motto to eradicate hunger to achieve food security with improved nutrition and sustainable agriculture. Hunger and micronutrient malnutrition or hidden hunger, can affect the energy status of an individual, making them more prone to diseases. Goal 3, of SDG ensures good health and well-being for all age groups. The outbreak of the COVID-19
